►►► Trends influencing what we eat

Consumers today are more connected than ever to their food — and that connection is driving change across supply chains throughout the food system. In the protein industry, innovation, convenience, nutrition, transparency and sustainability are leading to new products and practices. Looking toward 2020, Cargill shared 10 trends influencing what we eat, how we eat and the way we interact with our food.

1. Growing appeal of protein — U.S. consumers have a growing appetite for protein, with 55% of U.S. households saying high protein is an important attribute to consider when buying food. In fact, 65% of consumers often or always think about protein in their diets, and 46% are trying to increase protein intake.

2. Animal protein an important part of the food landscape — Meat eating in the United States is still an important part of the diet, with 86% of shoppers reporting they eat animal protein and more than two-thirds of consumers saying they intend to maintain or increase their consumption of animal protein in the next year.

3. Alternative proteins increasing — Consumer interest in non-meat protein options is increasing — from hybrid products to plant or cell-based and even insect protein. In fact, the number of new U.S. food and drink products that mentioned “plant-based” grew 268% between 2012 and 2018; and 87% of Americans are using plant-based protein in their diets.

4. Personalized diets on the horizon — Technology is driving the personalized nutrition movement as scientists are getting closer to being able to provide guidance for each person about what their ideal diet should be by utilizing artificial intelligence and machine learning.

5. Size matters — According to Cargill's Future of Beef report, in addition to looking for beef to be on sale more often, consumers are looking for retailers to offer beef in smaller packages, feeding one or two people. This trend is especially popular among senior singles.

6. Convenience is king — The “now” culture created by Amazon and almost instant delivery also translates to food. Consumers can get meals by mobile ordering, delivery services, delivery meal kits, in-store meal kits and kiosks. Sales of value-added meat and poultry, which provide shortcuts of some kind, rose 5% in 2018.

7. Making the grade — Most consumers say that USDA grades are important to them. Claims that support personal values, such as sustainability, also appeal to many consumers. However, the myriad of messages that are used today have caused a degree of confusion amongst beef consumers. There is an opportunity for the industry to help educate consumers so they can make more informed decisions.

8. Consumers exploring global flavors — From West Africa to North Africa, the Pacific Rim and Latin America, consumers are moving out of their comfort zones to explore bolder global flavors. This more-adventurous consumer is being driven by a world that is connected through travel and social media.

9. Snack time upgraded — More of our daily eating is snacking vs. sit-down meals. As a result, nutrition needs to be provided in convenient, snackable formats. Today the refrigerated section of the grocery store is filling with fresh snacks, including protein, as are convenience stores.

10. Digital dining — Consumers increasingly want to know where their food comes from and better understand the supply chain that brings it to them. Technologies like blockchain can aid farm-to-fork programs, enhancing food security and traceability. ■
